In the human genome, relatively small numbers of genes have been identified that are specifically required for normal development and differentiation, and only a few of these have been molecularly dissected to identify their protein products. Comparison of the available data shows that at least 20% of the human genome is comprised of various types of repetitive DNA. In eukaryotic cells, these repeats are transcribed, but for unknown reasons, do not code for an active protein. This makes them attractive targets for the RNA interference (RNAi) pathway because their protein products can be introduced into a cell via a nucleic acid vehicle of relatively low toxicity, thereby acting as potential triggers for the RNAi pathway. This model may also be amenable to delivery of microRNA analogs because such compounds can act at low concentrations without triggering a massive antiviral response. In this chapter we will review some of the recent progress in small interfering RNA (siRNA) delivery in cancer cells and this approach may be extended to other diseases, including viral infections.Hochheim (disambiguation) Hochheim is a town in the state of Hesse, Germany.
